THREE cotton mills near Augusta, Ga., have during the past four years, with a capital of $1,600,000, paid their operatives in cash $1,560,000, and their stockholders $540,000 in dividends, besides expending $5,673,000 for the purchase of cotton and other material for manufacturing purposes. Such substantial figures as these ought to attract not only capital but intelligent laborers from points where work is scarce.

Plates are cut of strong paper or thin pasteboard of the size of the objects to be produced. These are moistened with a liquid consisting of weak gelatine solution with sodium waterglass, and pressed in heated metallic molds. After drying, the pressed paper objects are coated on both sides with an adhesive material made of five parts Russian gelatine and one part thick turpentine, the shavings are applied to them, and the whole is subject to pressure. Wood shavings alone would, because of their unequal thickness, present uneven surfaces. The objects are now cut, if necessary, dried and varnished.

A Poet-Cobbler. Oatmeal has been indorsed by the Oatmeal has been indorsed by the medical faculty as excellent brain food. Scotland, where it is eaten by all classes, might be cited to authenticate the statement. In fact, many of her poets, geologists, essayists and historians could truthfully have used the motto which Sydney Smith proposed for the Edinburgh Review—"We cultivate literature on a little patmeal" on a little oatmeal." But whether it is due to an oatmeal diet, or to her churches and schools, or to her magnificent scenery, so replete with poetic associations, the fact is that Scotland has produced an astonishing number of poets from her brawny peasants. Plowmen, shepherds, weavers and cobblers have been enrolled in the guild, while the best writer of descrip-guild, while the best writer of descriptive geology, Hugh Miller, whose prose is poetry, was a stone-mason.

One of the poet-cobblers was John Younger, who kept a little shop at St. Boswell, a small village not far from Edinburgh. John was also an ardent angler, and had been, from the time he could handle "a rowan tree-sapling, a thread and bent preen." At his workshop one would be sure to meet the analysis. shop one would be sure to meet the anglers of the district, anxious to get a hint as to the best trout-pool or salmon-

But when John was seen to throw down the shoes he was cobbling and spread a sheet of paper upon the lap-stone, his visitors kept quiet. They knew that then he was neither cobbler nor fisherman, but a "rapt, inspired" poet. When the inspiration had passed into written lines, John's visitors had a treat awaiting them if they would but listen to the poet. Such was John's reputation as a fisherman and writer, that the editor of Blackwood's Magazine secured from him an article on "Salmon Fishing." and for a long time it was the text-book to which anglers referred.

When Prince Albert offered three prizes for the best essays on the temporal advantages of the Sabbath to the laboring classes, John's friends, after much persuasion, induced him to become a competitor. He had anly forty-eight hours to write the essay, for the announcement had arrived late in the village, and much time had been spent in overcoming the cobbler's diffidence.

But his essay won the second prize.

became blind from a cataract on both and visitors were discussing fishing or politics, for John was as ardent a politician as an angler, he would steal away to the adjoining room.

Here, in a chair by the ingle-menk [fireside corner] sat the poor, helpless, blind wife, always listening for the sound of the step that told of the coming of the one man she loved. Taking her hand, the old man would whisper a tender word, and, bending down, kiss her. Wiping away a tear, John would return to his lapstone, while she would count the minutes till he came

That was the poetry of the heart, which, when it passed from tender caress into rhyme, said:

Though teeth are fled and locks grown gray, She's yet so kind and cannie, Love that outlasts young life's heyday Is the love I bear my Nannie, John did not leave his Nannie lonely he closed her "e'e," for she departed four years before he left the body.

Attacked by a Ferocious Lion. An underkeeper in a menagerie was attacked by a lion in Birmingham, England. He entered the cage in order to clean it. To separate the animals from that part of the cage that was to be cleaned a wooden panel was used. It reached from the top to the floor of the cage, and was about two inches in thick-The underkeeper, Harris by name, does not appear to have absolutely closed the panel as he entered. The argest lion-a powerful animal named 'Wallace"--- sprang toward Harris, the sliding panel gave way from the pressure, and the man stood unprotected in front of the lion, who with its mouth seized the poor fellow by the shoulder. Harris, who had a broom in his hand, pluckily defended himself for a few moments by striking the lion with the handle of the broom. But the lion, clutching him with one of its paws, dashed him to the ground and began gnawing at his body, from which the blood was freely flowing. The lion tamer, Alicamonsa, who was at the opposite side of the hall, hearing the commotion, ran to the cage. With the tamer, who had with him a loaded whip,
